As "One search" option for e–Resources does not lead to the searched article, instead I have to go to each database, for exapmple ACS or Science Direct to search for the article, could this be simplified to using "one search". In addition, my home country university library subscribe is linked with the Google search engine, so I also can get PDF full article just use Google.

Actually, I relayed this concern previously. It was about the projects that are mentioned in the news of KU website. I wanted to know if library can help acquire these projects reports. But I was answered that it is not possible for the library. No worries about that, but in case if there is a chance of changing the policy and the library is also availble to acquire materials related to those projects, that will be highly resourceful particularly for the graduate students and the researchers. Afterall, these projects are the intellectual property of the university and using them in every possible way for the capacity building of the researchers of KU should be encouraged by all means.

Perhaps, create a e–resource internally where KU researchers could share their publications at the development stage or in–press stage to other KU researchers

Comments
A permament curation of MOOC (both from reknown and paid platforms) to be augmented with KU–originated courses, over time, could become a valuable resource for the KU academic communityc a specialist librarian may be needed to provide support on all matters related to Scopus and other citation database of KU faculty.

Provide a list of the research centers and websites whose work are accessible by KU students. Maybe a weekly book recommendations for self development. Providing further reading material for different academic and social courses. Allowing students to create forums for sharing interest with each other and discussing academic life issues if possible. Thank you.

Create a place where staff and students WANT to hang out, not just to study but as a think tank. Have current event discussion circles. Bring in motivational speakers; connect with academic departments including the Innovation Center to create a Maker Space, Art Space, Writing Circles to encourage creativity and design.
